

Throughout my recent posts, my message has been: hire the wrong person and it's going to cost you money...Heaps! Simple really.

The old chestnut 'Hire attitude and then train', in this brave new world of data and measurements, is an old belief.

Don't get me wrong, a good attitude makes a difference, but traits or behaviours are key, in my view.

These were our main trait preferences:

Able to work on their own

Good prospector

Motivated by the Challenge

Understood what we did and how to sell it- then got on with it

Good people person

Curious

And many more.

How did we know:

We put all our people through the hoops that we talked about in previous posts. Then, after searching high and low, discovered an assessment to find those traits. FREE REPORT

This product provided us with a comprehensive objective assessment of a potential salesperson's core character traits, and how they relate to success in a competitive sales position.

Simply put, it assessed how natural a fit to a sales career would be for this person.
