

A Valuable Lesson.

Throughout my 30 years of selling advertising to companies of all sizes, I learned many valuable lessons. I began as a door-to-door stationary salesperson in Sydney, selling everything from pencils to exercise books. I then moved on to selling carpet services in London, utilizing promotional brochures to generate leads. It was during this time that I realized the importance of face-to-face sales.

Direct media selling was my next endeavour, where I discovered the challenge of selling something invisible – a service, rather than a physical product.

Selling the Invisible

Advertising is intangible, existing in the form of airtime or a gap in a TV program. Building trust became critical to my success, and I quickly learned the value of meeting clients in person to establish a relationship.

As my career progressed, I discovered the power of selling to many.

When I started NRS Media, my partner Doug Gold introduced me to the concept of a “membership program.” Advertisers could purchase advertising time at a discounted rate, but only if they committed to a 12-month automatic debit payment plan.

This approach generated over $1 million in advertising commitment before the media company even launched.

I developed a sales system around this model, generating over $1 billion in revenue for our media partners worldwide.

Our seminars, using a “one-to-many” presentation model, boasted attendance rates of 70-80%, with closing rates as high as 50%.

The key to success lies in developing a process for your product, which can be easily accomplished through digital means. Many companies are already doing an excellent job of utilizing the one-to-many approach to distributing their information.

In conclusion, while face-to-face sales remain essential, selling to many through a free seminar or digital process has become increasingly crucial.

I encourage you to have fun selling your products this week, utilizing the power of technology and personal relationships to build lasting connections with your clients.
