

If you've read my last few posts, you'll see that I've been discussing the mistakes business owners make (I have made every one of them- no kidding!) when it comes to getting the right salesperson on your team. I want to give you as much value as I can, so here are three important hoops (as I call them) that you might want to think about when it comes to employing new salespeople.

Structure Not Gut

Hoop 1- Company Culture Fit Company Culture- While we believe that fitting in with the company culture is important, as demonstrated in the graph on our FREE report, it makes up only 10%. Don't get too caught up in making sure this is a major part of the recruiting process. Create a good job description. This is a critical factor in hiring good salespeople. When you advertise for a salesperson what do you ask? How do you define the role? What are you looking for? What is the remuneration? *Chet Holmes, one of my early mentors, always did this exercise when advertising for super salespeople. Write down three initiatives that you would love to hire someone to do in your business. Three only. Next to each one, do this: What would it mean to your business? How would it change your business? Now list what you could afford to pay such people if they really performed. Do the exercise. This forms the foundation of good a job description. Hoop 2- Structuring an interview - History of Success. Once you get the CV's for the position, look for a history of success. Somewhere that you can see a challenge; a life experience that they overcame. Structuring an interview- A structured interview process makes up 30% or a third of the process (FREE report). That's a lot. In your structured interview, you should have some questions to ask, after reading the CV. Here are a few to start with. How do you function as a team? How do you feel about operating in a team environment? Do you like working on your own outside of that team? Can you tell me about a time when you were asked to do a project on your own? What was it? These questions might just get the process moving. Challenge the candidate- You are hiring salespeople to do a specific job. Human beings inherently will do anything to avoid pain. However, in the business of selling, rejection is part of what selling really is, and it can be painful. If everyone got 100% of the business every time they presented a product, the salesperson would be out of business. If you are hiring a salesperson to sell your product and prospecting is part of that, would you not at least ask them “What happens when you get a ‘ No!’ – How do you react?” Ask them this, and see what happens: “ You know what, I’m not convinced that you are the right person for this job.” Observe their reaction. Do they just sit there? Or do they do something that indicates to you they might do the same with a client? Hoop 3- Assessment Tools This also makes up 30% of the job evaluation- We personally take a lot of guidance from these types of assessments and we go into more detail here: Download my FREE report We used to call these the B.S. detector. We carried these assessments out in my company specifically for the roles we were looking for, in salary and performance-based positions. Our salespeople had to work alone. We had salespeople sprinkled all over the world; usually unmanaged, working in an unstructured environment. We had to be really clear on what we were looking for. That’s where traits/ behaviours come into play. We knew we had to hire for the task, not just the attitude. In my next post, I explain what I look for in a salesperson, and how I came to that.
